My Favourite Interval of One Day

Days pass like the flow of river, and the shower time - my favourite interval of one day - is a glistening stream do you mean "sneaking"? snaking in the forest of my heart. I do love the sense of being wrapped in the warm vapour. Not only can the bathroom provide me with space to sing freely, but also the white sound of splash never fails to take the heavy load off my mind. Last but not least, ~~as~~ for me, taking a shower is a ritual on a daily basis instead of a routine. It is reported that ~~the~~ average people spend more than a year of their life in the shower, and I suppose the time I spend won't be less, for shower time exerts a peculiar fascination on me.

Having a shower offers me a cosy atmosphere. Water, bubbles, vapour, scent of bath gels and mild water temperature make a joint effort to refresh every exhausted person, physically and psychologically. Luxuriated in this condition, I will gradually calm down, as if there were a gentle hand patting me on the head. During the summer, shower time is always ~~being~~ expected since I really want to get rid of the annoying sweat and the muggy weather by the foam and cool water; while in the freezing cold winter, a hot shower is as uplifting as a thick quilt or a cup of hot cocoa, especially when I'm enveloped in the vaporous warmth. Embraced by this kind of warmth, I undoubtedly love the comfort shower time brings to me.

Besides, shower time is leisure when I can feel free to sing. Given that the special structure of bathroom contributes to a better reverb effect, it seems that bathroom is a magical room where everyone's singing ~~songs~~ will sound more beautiful. What's more, too shy as I am to sing in normal times, taking a shower can trigger my burning passion for singing. The sound of splash erases my shyness, and the ^{private?} separate space gives me a stage to unleash my nature. Since I'm the only actor and audience, I can hum or sing aloud or even dance to the music as I like. That's a vital reason why I have a blast during the shower time.

Apart from providing a comparatively private room for me to sing, the shower time is a terrific break as well. The sound of water dropping from the showerhead dispels all the anxiety and burden. Thus it's a period of time when my imagination can run wild, when I reflect what I did, when I arrange a schedule for the next day, when I reminisce about the good times, when I think of a solution, when I review and gain a further insight into the new knowledge, and when I have the chance to think about nothing and just experience the tranquility of my life heart and soul. No matter how tired I was previously, I have always come alive after a shower.

Furthermore, the shower time is, as far as I'm concerned, a indispensable ritual that marks the end of a day. It is the moment when I put on my pajamas after having a shower that I realize the day has already fled by - and the shower time acts as ^{the} ~~a~~ role of boundary between ~~the~~ study and ~~the~~ relaxation. That is, I can fully enjoy the recreation after the shower according to the schedule I made for myself. Additionally, I attach such great importance ^{to} ~~on~~ the shower time partly because I'm a clean freak. I will be fidgeting and unwilling to touch every item that I presuppose only when I have taken a shower can I touch. That's why instead of considering my shower time as a monotonous daily routine, I prefer to deem it as a "sacred" ritual of cleanliness.

In conclusion, I enjoy being immersed in the shower time for both of ^{the} ~~its~~ cosy atmosphere and ^{it provides to} ~~its~~ freedom ~~for~~ me to release my nature. Loosening up my mind as well as providing me with a sense of ritual also make the shower time more attractive to me. Maybe taking a shower is just a trifle in others' views, yet for me it is because of this interval that I'm more sensitive to all the subtle happiness I've encountered in my life. Shower time is literally the time which totally belongs to me and my feelings.
